Or even keep up with him. Not the city maintenance crews. Not the department of transportation, which angrily lamented that a few minutes of tagging could take a whole day and three thousand dollars to remove . . . Hed go bombing -- tagging walls -- for two, even three days without really going home except to eat and change clothes. . . . He never thought about the damage he caused. It never occurred to him that writing was bad for the neighborhood. After all, he could be getting his thrills doing far worse things. . . . Now midway up the footpath he saw his destination -- the wall anchored to the side of the slope. It was flawless! . . . The wall overlooked all of Mission Valley and even if his tag was there for only a day, thousands of drivers would see it from the freeway below. Pretty good for seventeen years old. Damn good! . . . Slic had tagged from central San Diego to Chula Vista since he was thirteen --- writing mostly on vacant buildings and retaining walls along the freeways -- battling for space with other taggers -- dissing them by crossing out their tags and writing his over them -- watching over his tags to keep them from the humiliation of being dissed. . . . Cal Trans was going crazy trying to catch him and keep up with erasing his tags. And hed done it all alone! A oner! No crew of squealing fatuous kids backed him up. He never thought . . . Sics concentration was momentarily broken by a rustling...
