Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .but decaying organic matter in the forest and find the water swarming with bacteria. Here again the writer does not wish to be understood as advocating the introduction of fairies into nature, but of the two extremes it is better that he should find the woods peopled with these creatures than that he should see in nature only the recurring processes of life, death, fermentation and decay. In other words the ideal nature teacher should have a genuine love for nature rather than a technical knowledge of biological and physical sciences. Councillors Grace Brown Gardner State Normal School, Framingham, Massachusetts Probably no subject in the normal school curriculum has had a more varied career than that now designated by the general term of nature study. Natural history, which was taught in a desultory manner and at irregular intervals during the earlier years of the normal schools, early became differentiated into botany and zoology. These subjects were taught from a strictly scientific standpoint. Botany dealing largely with the analysis and classification of plants and the making of herbaria, and zoology with the structure and classification of animals and the formation of comparative collections. Later, with the aid of the compound microscope, these two subjects were studied in regard to cell and tissue structure. This technical work dealing largely with dead material was superseded by the study of biology, with the emphasis placed upon the life processes of living organisms. The constant change of aim and content in...
