Not illustrated. 1862 Excerpt: .never, indeed, have any solid foundations either for their principles or their hopes. But their case serves to show the unsubstantially of inward feeling and sentiment, that have no ground in suitable outward actions; and this is the more necessary to be seen, as it is a course which all are secretly inclined to follow. Every human being is a heaven and a world in the least form; his internal being an image of heaven, and his external an image of the world. Religion, to have actual and permanent existence in any one, must be present at once in its graces in the mind, and in its virtues in the outward life. The outward virtue is the foundation of the inward grace; and if these foundations are destroyed, the inward graces which rest upon them must pass away. Love is the highest grace of religion, and...
